

Sarah, a high school student with dyslexia, is struggling to keep up with reading assignments. Her parents want to request accommodations.

A new school is being built in the district. The architects are discussing accessibility features for students with physical disabilities.

Mark, a college student who uses a wheelchair, finds that many of the older buildings on campus don't have elevator access to upper floors where some of his classes are held.

Emily, a student with autism, is about to start high school. Her parents are concerned about her receiving appropriate support and services.

A public library is hosting a summer reading program. A parent inquires about accommodations for their child who is deaf.

John, a student with ADHD, is frequently getting in trouble for disruptive behavior. His parents believe he needs additional support in the classroom.

A community college is updating its website and wants to ensure it's accessible for students with visual impairments who use screen readers.

Lisa, a high school student with a physical disability, wants to join the school's drama club but is concerned about accessing the stage for performances.

A teacher notices that one of her students seems to have difficulty hearing and wants to initiate the process for evaluation.

A recent college graduate with anxiety is applying for jobs. Should she disclose her disability, and under what law?

A visually impaired customer needs a Braille menu at a restaurant. Which law applies in this situation?

Harrison, who uses a wheelchair, can't access his local library due to stairs. What law protects his right to access public buildings?